When president-in-waiting Jacob Zuma comes to power following this week's general elections, lecturers and managers will be replaced at the University of Cape Town - the country's top research university - because it remains a hotbed of counter-revolutionaries. So says Julius Malema, president of the ruling African National Congress's Youth League, writes Quinton Mtyala in the Cape Times.

"Forces that are opposed to our revolution are still here. We must change the management of this university and also the lecturers. This is our university, we must change the look of this university, (it) should reflect South Africa," said Malema at Jameson Hall as the ANC Youth League took its election campaign to South Africa's oldest university.

At the start of Malema's visit, chaos broke out at the Beattie Building lecture hall, where he had been scheduled to speak, when a large group was turned away at the doors by campus security due to overcrowding at the venue. He later move to a packed Jameson Hall as Youth League supporters, bussed to the venue, sang songs praising him and Zuma.
